For decades the notion of “de-extinction” (17) ---- scientific circles, but now through new advances in genetic engineering, researchers are believing that it’s time to start thinking seriously about which animals we might be able to bring back, and which ones would do the most good for the ecosystems they left behind. (18) ----, earlier this month, a group of ecologists published guidelines for how to choose which species to revive (19) ---- we want to do the most good for our planet’s ecosystems. The two animals at the forefront of this discussion are the woolly mammoth, a hairy, close relative of the elephant that lived in the Arctic, and the passenger pigeon, a small, gray bird (20) ---- a pinkish red breast once extremely common in North America. The last mammoths died about 4000 years ago, and the passenger pigeon (21) ---- around 1900. Research on reviving both species is well underway, and scientists close to the field think de-extinction for these animals is now a matter of “when,” not “if.”
